Updated May 18, 2017 / Original May 16, 2017 Order Reprints Print Article Getty Images Online Brokers have the prizes in a frantic offer to attract new investors. But one analyst expects the cuts to be over for now, and that's good news for TD Ameritrade. Wells Fargo analyst Christopher Harris writes that TD Ameritrade shares are likely to rise in the coming months as fears of further fee cuts subside and the company completes the acquisition of Scottrade, another discount broker with a large branch network. Investors have been wary of buying the shares of discount brokers since they lowered their trading fees in late February and early March. According to Harris, it was the first big price cut in seven years. Ameritrade lowered its fee from USD 9.99 to USD 6.95 per trade. Since the last round of cuts, brokers' shares have fallen; Ameritrade has since fallen by more than 10%. But Harris believes the price cuts are likely to stop, at least in the near term. Charles Schwab was aggressive, which would have cut prices, and would be the likely instigator of a new round of cuts, Harris wrote. But Schwab has big plans for the next few years, including doubling the branch network. Further cuts in commissions would likely deprive the initiative of resources, he wrote. Schwab CHIEF executive Walt Bettinger said in the company's recent conference call that we have achieved the goals we had through the price cuts. Harris expects Ameritrade's stock to rise to 44 US dollars from the last year of 38.27 US dollars. Big picture: TD Ameritrade's stock was set to rise as a fee war among online brokers fades. Thank you This article was sent to NEW YORK (TheStreet) -- As the moral debate continues to rage, the fact that online gambling is gaining traction in the United States is gaining traction. This week, New Jersey joined Nevada and Delaware as the only states with legalized online gambling and is certainly the largest in terms of population. Although another state is not earth-destroying, it could really start turning the tide in the gambling universe if it proves to be a success. If the experience goes well in New Jersey, more states are likely to begin legalizing online gambling, though many political leaders claim to focus on their moral compass, with their biggest concern being addiction problems. However, this has not stopped them from allowing the public to legally drink alcohol, smoke cigarettes or buy scratchless lottery tickets, so I think it is will not hinder the national legalisation of online gambling, especially if the expected revenues are taken into account. If the shift to online gambling eventually progresses, will that mean the end of Atlantic City, Las Vegas, and other physical casino buildings and resorts? I have my doubts. A lot of people don't go to Vegas just to fix their gambling. You go for the ambience with friends and or sometimes it is for companies, events and seminars. Ultimately, the casinos are likely to be the biggest winners. For now, online gambling websites must be operated through casinos. That may or may not change in the future, but it's a good sign for the casinos that are slowly bleeding out. Revenues in Atlantic City are about 40% away from their 2006 peak, which means that the successful transition to online gambling is all the more important. The biggest dilemma facing it is strict regulation with concerns about age restrictions and addiction problems. Apart from reconciling the sources of revenue with the obvious problem that gambling can ruin the lives of some people, politicians must decide whether it is fair that a majority of the population is held back by something because a minority of people cannot control it. To me, it seems like a when, not a scenario. When you're in camp that online gambling eventually sees its way through the regulations and on tablet screens and smartphones, there are some casino stocks you should buy because they're willing to jump through all the legal and regulatory hoops and then dominate the market share. Not all are on board, according to a recent Bloomberg report. Some are all in favour of the move, such as MGM Resorts International (MGM) - Get Report CEO Jim Murren, who said [Nevada must] be able to compress with other states to increase liquidity pools and increase overall visits at all locations. I think that will happen. He is a proponent of legalization across the country at a later date. MGM recently teamed up with Bwin.Party Digital Entertainment, the world's largest online gambling site. The company trades on the London Stock Exchange and has a major focus on poker and sports betting, the former of which was the main reason MGM wanted to strike a deal. In addition to MGM in the push for online gambling is Gary Loveman, CEO of CaesarsEntertainment (CZR) - Get Report. Like Murren, Loveman has a focus on nationwide legalization and considers online poker a very important business for his company. Unlike MGM and CZR, WynnResorts (WYNN) - Get Report CEO Steve Wynn is hesitant about moving into the digitized world of online gambling and admits he doesn't see the business opportunity. While Wynn is uncertain about the future, LasVegasSands' (LVS) - Get Report CEO Sheldon Adelson is firmly opposed. He called it a social evil that must stop, with concerns about child's play and addiction problems. Perhaps Adelson is more concerned about not getting his share of the online cake, as a whopping majority of LVS revenue comes from overseas, with only 14% coming from the US. But perhaps they are Adelson's concerns in this matter. From the shareholders' point of view, it seems good that most of the company's revenue comes from outside the US, as LVS is unlikely to jump on the online bandwagon anytime soon. Whether it is now or wrong, I think online gambling will eventually be legal in the US. The question remains for investors: which companies benefit the most and which do not? My bet would be on early users like MGM and CZR. Although they are likely to overcome some obstacles along the way, they could consolidate a dominant position over companies such as WYNN and LVS, based on management's acceptance of the new world gambling order. At the time of publication, the author did not have a position in any of the above-mentioned stocks.
